"The darkening is primarily being caused by the increasing levels of organic compounds in the waters, brought to the coasts via regional rivers and lake drainage."

"This fresh water contains far more coloured organic matter (CDOM) than marine water, so our coastal waters are darkening."

- professor Aksnes

"Periphylla periphylla is a very light-sensitive jellyfish that thrives best in the world's very deep marine waters, but the water (...) has now become so murky and dark that it probably is helping this jellyfish to thrive. At the same time, the fjord has become less hospitable as a habitat for important fish species."

Is it? This WANDERER/WONDERER is a moveable of wonder.

So far, for the present proposal, the surface
may be left see trough and let the audience admire its content from the outside, or covered up in a pitch black material and invite people to enter its guts.

Names and etymology.

The names are held to derive from Common Germanic nikwus or nikwis(i), derived from PIE neigw ("to wash"). They are related to Sanskrit nēnēkti, Greek νίζω nizō and νίπτω níptō, and Irish nigh (all meaning to wash or be washed). The form neck appears in English and Swedish (näck or nek, meaning "nude"). The Swedish form is derived from Old Swedish neker, which corresponds to Old Icelandic nykr (gen. nykrs), and nykk in Norwegian Nynorsk. In Finnish, the word is näkki. In Old Danish, the form was nikke and in modern Danish and Norwegian Bokmål it is nøkk. The Icelandic nykur is a horse-like creature. In Middle Low German, it was called necker and in Middle Dutch nicker (c.f. also Nickel or Nikkel plus Kobolt). The Old High German form nihhus also meant "crocodile", while the Old English nicor could mean both a "water monster" like those encountered by Beowulf, and a "hippopotamus". The Norwegian Fossegrim and Swedish Strömkarlen are related figures sometimes seen as by-names for the same creature. The Scandinavian version can transform himself into a horse-like kelpie, and is called a Bäckhästen (the "brook horse"), whilst the Welsh version is called the Ceffyl Dŵr (the "water horse").
